With technology enabling our cities as places of 'distributed working', we move with ease from building to building, café to airport. How do we create and retain 'community' within these rising concrete jungles? The idea of the vertical community is not a new one, but it is one that now increasingly we must seed and grow between developers, designers, and end users alike.

Philip Ross
unwork
Philip will explore the new concept of Jelly Bean working where emerging technology will change the way we connect, communicate, collaborate and manage distributed work and workers. The Jelly Bean will begin to appear on the software we use and allow a paradigm shift in how we connect with colleagues and clients. With a focus on future collaboration technologies, Philip will also look at the spaces we need to create for teams in the future from Agile Scrum to pitches and war rooms.

China faces a talent shortage; for the second year in a row, the total size of China's workforce has fallen due to an ageing population. As the new generation entering the workplace is smaller and employers face competition from the West for top graduates, how can office design positively support talent retention?

Duncan Young
Our society has become increasingly sedentary with inactivity now a leading cause of lifestyle disease in Australia. Currently building design and way of working is adding to this burden. Our research highlights inactivity in the workplace and provides solutions to increase workplace health and productivity.

Vivien Leong
The Learning Hub is envisioned as a showcase for modern methods of learning and teaching, fostering entrepreneurship, innovation and social awareness. Stemming from NTU's 'flipped classroom' pedagogy, innovative design methods include a generous corridor which doubles as informal study areas, encouraging interaction and collaboration.

Grace Sai
Startups and corporates have long been in contradiction, until a handful of startups started disrupting entire industries: from hospitality to transportation, logistics to commerce. Corporates are now choosing to outsource their own innovation to startups. What will this mean for the future of enterprise?
